Introduction

Tattoo prejudice has always been an important point especially when it comes to finding a job or having relationships. The discrimination of this topic might also lead to mental health problems and/or relationship issues between the person with tattoos and the manager, the client, or even the family member. Throughout this report, communication, multi-disciplinary teamwork, multi-professional and collaboration will be discussed. Furthermore, Theories of communication and the impact of communication style on the professional work environment will be analysed. Finally, some theories of conflict management and the difference between cross-cultural communication and intercultural communication will also be explored.

Body of the Essay

The video chosen, it's highlighted the way that society sees and prejudices different perspectives of beauty in people. Three people were chosen to express the reasons why they feel pretty with tattoos and to be part of a social experiment on the streets. They started the experiment by speaking about tattoos' background story. They further explained why they feel good with their tattoos. For example, one of the three people explained that he has a big rose tattoo on his face as a memory of his daughter that passed away. These people went on the streets covered in tattoos asking simple questions like asking for directions, and they were ignored. They mentioned that they are used to getting ignored by people and people saying that they are "discussed" by them. Afterwards, they had a team of professional makeup artists cover all the tattoos, to make the experiment once again without the tattoos, and the questions were answered and not ignored. The people with tattoos were impressed that people talked with them since they are not used to that, even though they said they don't regret making the tattoos. Another difficult thing that people with tattoos have to go through is finding a job or being accepted by one. When they went to places that were looking for employers, they were told to just apply online or that they were not accepting more employers at the moment because of their tattoos.

This kind of prejudice can negatively influence people with tattoos' communication and ability to work on a team with others. Communication is the practice of sharing information, especially when it helps individuals or groups better understand each other (Cambridge Dictionary, 2023). Without good communication, the common goal they are trying to achieve won't be easy to achieve. Multi-professionals are a team of people working together who are members of many professional organizations, or diverse disciplines within a single professional group (Academy of Medical Royal Colleges, 2021). Collaboration is defined as a situation when at least two individuals cooperate to produce or accomplish a common goal (Cambridge Dictionary, 2019).

As communication is an important aspect when working in any kind of workplace, four types of communication are important to note. These four types are passive, aggressive, passive-aggressive, and assertive communication (Martins, 2022).

The majority of the time, passive communicators don't engage in conflict and may even come out as submissive (Martins, 2022). They may communicate nonverbally by doing things like crossing their arms and avoiding eye contact (Martins, 2022).

An aggressive communicator has a strong sense of self-assurance and may not be open to hearing what their teammates have to say (Martins, 2022). They frequently insert their own opinions into conversations and occasionally may even use harsh words like "you're wrong" or "you don't get it." This individual will keep eye contact when speaking nonverbally (Martins, 2022).

A person who communicates in a passive-aggressive manner is uncomfortable expressing their true feelings (Martins, 2022). Their nonverbal and verbal communication may not line up, like in the case when they express excitement verbally yet exhibit contrary body languages, such as a scowl or hunched shoulders (Martins, 2022).

Someone with an assertive communication style defends their interests (Martins, 2022). They are the kind of communicators who can articulate their goals, the rights of others, or their interests while also advocating on their behalf (Martins, 2022). When expressing nonverbally, assertive communicators may make gestures with their hands, and they almost certainly have relaxed or comfortable facial expressions when speaking (Martins, 2022).

Throughout the video, various types of communication were used, as well as different communication theories. The first theory is the four-sides model of communication that includes: factual information, self-revelation, relationship, and appeal (Ranftler, 2016). These four sides all belong to the concept of communication (Ranftler, 2016). Messages that are can be transmitted and understood in a variety of ways, and the recipient may not necessarily comprehend what the sender was trying to say (Ranftler, 2016). The factual information side of this theory is objective and based on facts (Schiffer, 2017). The following side is self-revelation which consists of implicit information from the sender, for example, feelings, emotions, likes/dislikes, or values (Schiffer, 2017). The next side of the four-sides model is the relationship that is based on the relationship between the sender and receiver, whether they get along or how they think of each other (Schiffer, 2017). The last side is the appeal which is explained as being based on desire, advice, instructions, or commands that the sender is looking for (Schiffer, 2017).

Relating this theory of communication to the video chosen, when the people with tattoos were approaching random people and asking easy questions, they are having a relationship kind of communication. This is because of the way that people were ignoring the people with tattoos due to their relationship and based on what they think of each other.

Furthermore, another communication theory will be evaluated. This next theory is the Shannon-weaver model. The Shannon and Weaver model, a linear representation of communication, offers a framework for investigating both the sending and receiving of messages (Drew, 2023). The connection that this theory has with the video is the way that the people with tattoos are sending a message directly to the people on the streets by asking a question, as well as the people on the streets are receiving the message.

The last theory of communication that is going to be analysed is the Transactional Analysis Model. The approach of transactional analysis is used to study the process of transactions when communicating with others (Murray, 2023). It calls on us to be conscious of our feelings, thoughts, and behaviours when interacting with others. Three "ego states" make up the human personality, according to transactional analysis, and each one is a whole system of feelings, thoughts, and actions that influences how we interact with one another (Murray, 2023). Transactional analysis theory is built on the interplay between the Parent, Adult, and Child ego states (Murray, 2023).

The child state can be divided into the Adapted Child Ego and the Free Child Ego states (Murray, 2023). The Adapted Child state complies with the wants of others and behaves in a way that makes them feel good about themselves and accepted (Murray, 2023). However, it also has a rebellious side that manifests as resistance, confrontation, and emotional reaction in the face of imagined conflict (Murray, 2023).

The parent state may be divided into two types: the critical/ controlling parent state and the nurturing parent state. The critical parent expresses disapproval in a severe, possibly hostile manner (Murray, 2023). The nurturing parent, on the other hand, attempts to take control of a situation in a more rescue manner, attempting to calm people (Murray, 2023).

The adult state doesn't have any divisions as the other two have. This mentality is more accessible more logical, and slower to pass harsh judgements on people or situations. (Murray, 2023)

The communication between the people with tattoos and the people on the streets was an Adult-Child Interaction. The people with tattoos were in the Adult state as they were only asking quick and easy questions. However, as the people on the streets were ignoring them and being unfriendly, they were having the Free Child Ego state type of communication/interaction.

The reason why there was a negative impact on the communication style between the people on the streets and the people with tattoos, was due to discrimination against tattooed people. When they had their tattoos no one on the streets spoke or even looked at them, on the other hand, when they didn't have any tattoos, everyone answered them and made a visual communication.

A multidisciplinary team also referred to as an integrative team, combines people who have unique abilities and skills in many fields to benefit an organization (Indeed Editorial Team, 2022). Integrative teams may be found in a variety of sectors, including business, healthcare, and education (Indeed Editorial Team, 2022). Integrative teams are primarily formed to use different points of view to enhance company operations, address difficult issues, and produce quicker outcomes (Indeed Editorial Team, 2022).

According to Duggan (2021), people that work in interdisciplinary teams bring a variety of complementary abilities and experiences to the table, which benefits the project/work. They might not, however, have similar communication preferences or customs. Without effective communication, the team's ability to accomplish its goals may suffer from errors and uncertainty (Duggan, 2021). For this reason, it's crucial to create goals as well as strategies that will improve communication (Duggan, 2021).

According to Coursera (2023), the process of identifying and resolving problems equitably and effectively is referred to as conflict management. The objective is to raise the likelihood of a successful conclusion while minimizing any potential negative effects that may result from conflicts. Some factors that can influence a conflict would be personal values, communication style, perceptions, or power dynamics.

There are a couple of theories that can further explain conflict management. The first theory that will be analysed will be the Thomas-Kilmann Conflict Mode Instrument (TKI). As Guzowski (2022) explained, there are five conflict reactions/styles that may be evaluated based on measures of assertiveness (how much we concentrate on our demands during the dispute) and cooperativeness (how much we concentrate on other people's wants over our own during the conflict). They are competing, accommodating, avoiding, collaborating, and compromising. Everyone handles conflict differently, but we generally fall back on one or two of the styles. Knowing our styles can help decrease interpersonal conflict. This can help minimize team conflict and boost productivity, efficiency, and well-being.

The next theory to be analysed is Social Identity Theory (SIT). The concept of Social Identity Theory is that individuals construct their own identities in relation to social groupings and that such identifications act to maintain and strengthen self-identity (Islam, 2014). SIT is a classic social psychology theory that tries to explain intergroup conflict in terms of group-oriented self-definitions (Islam, 2014).

The final theory of conflict management is the Interest-Based Relationship (IBR). Analysed by Lau (2019), the Interest-Based Relationship method emphasizes the significance of keeping people and their emotions separate from the problem. A goal of this theory is to encourage mutual understanding and respect, which establish connections among partners and may ultimately assist in the peaceful resolution of conflicts. The method proposes a 6-step technique for solving conflicts. According to Lau (2019), the 6-step technique consists of “Prioritize Good Relationships”, “People Are NOT the Cause of Problem”, “Listen from ALL Stances”, “Listen Comes First, Talk Follows”, “Understand the Facts, Then Address the Problem” and “Solve the Problem Together”.

The last topic that will be looked at will be the differences between cross-cultural and intercultural communication between people.

Firstly, Cross-cultural communication theory investigates how people from various nations, races, and cultures may best communicate with one another (MasterClass, 2022). In this case, as seen in the video, the different cultures are the people with tattoos and the people without. They need to find ways to best communicate between them.

Secondly, Intercultural communication is the study of communication between cultures and social groups, and it examines the many methods of communication and challenges that arise among groups of people from different cultural backgrounds (Team, 2020). When it comes to tattooing their griefs, traumas, or even just art on their bodies, the tattoo community is remarkably unified. People on the streets need to first understand the reason why tattooed people tattooed themselves. There is always a meaning behind everything, people should not make assumptions related to the other person, neither discriminate nor judge.

Conclusion

Concluding this report, everyone is different, and no one should ever discriminate against someone due to their race, beliefs, or likes/dislikes. Prejudice towards them can have a negative effect on persons with tattoos' capacity to communicate and collaborate with others. Instead of criticizing a person based on their appearance rather than their skill, it should be considered how crucial a variety of communication different types are when it comes to modifying to a new culture and having more understanding about tattoos.
